Sunday, April 15, Button Up! Schertle, Alice. ISBN Review and Critical Analysis. Schertle utilizes the technique of personification throughout the collection very successfully. Every piece of clothing belongs to a different owner, and as such each of these fifteen narrative poems has a distinct voice which comes through clearly. The collection is not organized in any particular fashion, and one poem does not relate to another. Every poem stands alone; what unifies them is the fact that they are all about clothing and how children use and wear that clothing. Schertle includes a Table of Contents for quick reference to the poems. The language she uses describes not only the clothing, but also the different situations in which the owners of the clothing find themselves. The hat describes being worn out on a hike, playing in the park, laying out at night and watching the stars, taking a bath with Violet and finally going to sleep with her.

This is the only poem that has the voice of more than one piece of clothing. A swimsuit, shoes, tops and panty hose are all worn by Jamelia at one time, and the reader gets the impression that the clothes enjoy the activity of dress up just as much as Jamelia. The helmet repeatedly makes the point that no matter what activity Bob decides to undertake it will protect him. Many of the poems employ various, very readable, rhyme schemes. In certain cases the second and fourth lines of a four line stanza rhyme, while the first and third do not. Another example is when Schertle employs alternating rhyme, or where the first and third, and second and fourth, lines of a four line stanza rhyme.

Whether the poems have a discernible rhyme scheme or not, they all flow extremely well and would be perfect to use in any read aloud activity. This poem has a very musical quality to it, utilizing onomatopoeia and also incorporating call and response. There are points in the poem where someone reading it would read a particular line, and then that line could be repeated back to them by the audience. Children will delight in seeing ostriches in sweaters, alligators in pajamas and cats in oversized blue jackets.

The illustrations are brightly colored, humorous, and playful. Mathers skillfully depicts the emotions the author intended in these endearing illustrations. Mathers portrays concentration as Jack bounces the soccer ball off his knee, watchfulness as Jack lines up the ball to be kicked into the goal and jubilation when Jack scores a goal. LOG IN. Clothing and dress. Language: English. Reviews: Horn Book. Fifteen adroitly phrased rhymes, voiced by pieces of clothing, reflect children's amiable relationships with these intimate possessions. Schertle's contagiously rhythmic, playful verse is perfectly reflected in the art full-page alternating with lively vignettes. From delicately comical to downright funny, Mathers brings her signature style to endearing watercolors of the various animals who stand in for children.

Each poem's title pairs a character's name with an article of clothing "Bertie's Shoelaces" while the body tells of shared activities and adventures. Some live hard, like the hand-me-down sweatshirt that's "been lost and recovered, been torn and been sewn. Personification can be tricky, but Schertle pulls it off admirably, in a simple, straightforward manner. She employs a variety of rhyme schemes and meters in the verses, giving each one a sprightly, humorous tone. Mathers's whimsy-filled watercolors place each article of clothing on an animal, and not just cats and dogs. There are otters and pigs, alligators and rabbits, emus and moles. And these creatures have personality, exuberance and high style that perfectly match the verses. Loads of fun. School Library Journal Starred Review.

K-Gr 2 Told from the points of view of various anthropomorphic articles of clothing, these poems will give readers a new perspective on getting dressed. Tanya's old T-shirt doesn't understand the shabby treatment it receives it didn't shrink, Tanya grew. I don't think it's fair. Emily's frilly undies seem to enjoy getting a little extra exposure. And Bob's bicycle helmet lives to protect Bob.
